

This is in response to the poor choice the FCC is about to possibly make regarding Low Power FM and allowing it to take over more FM translators from great stations like KLOVE. As a regular listener of KLOVE and a Christian who prefers this programming on a national basis because of my travels, I find KLOVE serves me rather well in the local area while I am home or at work locally. It is very popular here in Albuquerque and provides a great family set of music that people of all generations can listen to without being offended by tasteless music and commercials. If KLOVE was replaced by something else on a LPFM station, there is no guarantee that folks would even listen to the LPFM station, but it would merely run itself due to the need to sell commercials to survive. The LPFM community feels there is no need or little value for KLOVE on the airwaves. Well, if the FCC does its research, it will see KLOVE has actually expanded into new markets and in its popularity with all sorts of generations. The moral fiber of this great nation is at stake here. It is definitely in the public interest to serve great Christian radio to those of us who desire that stream of music in our ears everyday, especially here in Albuquerque where gangs, drugs, and the negative side of life is so prevalent. KLOVE actually saves people and helps them find Christ in their life. I am one of them and feel I owe a debt to KLOVE for helping me find my way. By moving KLOVE away from FM translators and having LPFM take over, you are doing a great disservice to those of us who honor Christ with our lives.
